Dr. Graham describes a variety of problems from different mathematical areas which are, for the most part, quite easy to state, and yet still continue to resist all our best efforts to solve them. He will also discuss the potential impact that computers of the future might (or might not) have in contributing to the solutions of these challenging problems.